I could picture Jane Austen reading some chapters and thinking: "This, but from the perspective of the woman". Along with millions of others, this soldier was charged with some sort of political crime, and since it was easier to confess than deny it and die, Ivan Denisovich "confessed" to "high treason" and received a sentence of 10 years in a Siberian labor camp. The enigmatic Stavrogin dominates the novel. TheIdiotVintageClassics. In practice, however, the women seem to be the only ones in control. One need not read extensively into Dostoevsky writings to understand that with every work he never fails to address his social climate. The book has both emotional power and an uncompromising insight into the human condition.
